I have sore wrists so I was wondering about the pulley mechanism as I age its really easy and does a fine job!! You only need a few pulls for loosely chopped pieces a few more for fine pieces and a few more you could have a pastelike mixture. I believe I could even do a nice pesto with this gadget. Sorry, we failed to record your vote. Please try again It's super useful to chop onions and garlic especially. The 4cup capacity allows for larger recipes of salsa, guacamole, nut butters, sauces, whipped cream and so much more. And the additional 4cup bowl with lid is a convenient way to store what you make. Its simple to use and comes with five recipes to get you started. What You Get Thanks for two containers and lids. Getting rid of that bulky difficult to store food processor that I hardly ever use! It is quick and easy. You can chop coarse or fine without cutting yourself on a chopping board. I would highly recommend this to anyone who does food prep and wants to save time. You can do many things, make peanut butter, just great. I dont feel like pulling out my big choppers for small jobs. <http://aceonlinementors.com/userfiles/how-to-manually-port-forward-minecraft.xml>

It does just what it says, chops onions, carrots, peppers, tomatoes, etc. You get two knives that help you to prep your vegetables and they work great. You need to put vegetables in that are small enough to be chopped, and once you do it will work terrific. Love this product and I would buy it again. The first time I used this product was to chop onions, NO TEARS!!! Love the fact you can have your vegetables small as you can have it, the best. Also I made salad dressing, Wow. Best product in the kitchen, save time in the prep, thank you Cuisinart love with product. I told my friends about this product. I cannot forget the knives that come with the processor, they are sharp, and they cut through whatever you are cutting very smoothly. Founded in 1971, Cuisinart's first appliance, a food processor, became immensely popular among home cooks. Since then, the company has grown and created just about everything you need to cook like a professional in your own kitchen, including mixers, automatic bread makers, juice extractors, grills, coffee makers, electric kettles and coffeebean grinders. They're compact and therefore portable and easy to store. They resemble salad spinners You either turn a crank or pull a cord to rotate a blade positioned inside the processor's workbowl. The more you turn or pull, the finer the chop. Like small food processors, they lack the size and the power to handle sticky doughs, and they won't entirely eliminate the need for a knife—you'll still need to cut food into pieces small enough to fit inside the workbowl. And unlike most electric food processors, these manual food processors don't have feed tubes, so you can't use them to make mayonnaise or other sauces that call for introducing liquids gradually. We also used them to make pesto, salsa, and guacamole. Two models had cranks and five had pull cords; workbowl capacities ranged from 2 to 6 cups. In small models with capacities of just 2 to 3 cups, we couldn't chop a whole medium onion in one go; we had to process it in two or three batches. And while all the machines could technically fit a full batch of every recipe we tried, we had to squeeze the food into the smaller models; guacamole or salsa ingredients sitting at the top of the crowded bowl weren't incorporated into the food churning below.

In general, the bigger the cut we were going for, the less consistently sized the pieces were, regardless of whether the models worked by crank or pull cord. Across the board, the models chopped onions and carrots into irregular, erratically sized pieces. Part of this had to do with the position and size of the blades. As we'd seen in previous food processor testings, models with relatively large gaps between the ends of the blades and the walls of the bowl didn't chop efficiently, allowing some of the food to whiz around the edges, out of the blade's reach. Similarly, models with large gaps between the lowest blade and the bottom of the bowl tended to trap chunks of food, preventing them from getting cut. We preferred models with less than 5 millimeters of clearance between the blades and the sides and bottom of the bowl. Smaller gaps made it more likely that all the food made contact with the blades. As a result, we typically ended up with bruised, sodden minced parsley and onions that had been pulverized into a pungent slurry. But this success came at the expense of time and effort. Making pesto proved to be one of the most revealing tests. It took most of the manual processors more than 3 minutes to transform basil, pine nuts, garlic cloves, and Parmesan into passable pesto. The best manual food processor performed this task the fastest, taking a nottooshabby 96 seconds to make good, smooth pesto, though its pull cord jammed repeatedly during the process. By contrast, our trusty fullsize Cuisinart processor took just 32 seconds to make an even more finely textured pesto. After pulling the cord of one manual model for 5.5 minutes, our triceps were aching and the pesto was still not fully processed. One style of manual processor wasn't easier to use than the other—it was just as tiring to rotate a crank as it was to pull a cord when we had to do it for more than 3 minutes.

<http://www.ladillo.com/images/consono-md110-manual.pdf>

Each task took between 30 and 40 seconds, only slightly longer than the conventional food processor about 20 seconds, but the textures of the salsas and guacamoles produced in the manual processors were more uneven than those of the ones made in the electric processor. Although most tasters didn't mind eating these more "rustic," irregularly textured dips, some objected to batches that contained big, harsh-tasting chunks of onion and chile. In fact, the opposite is often true. Just as with a conventional food processor, the blade attachment for each manual food processor must be mounted on a post in the middle of the workbowl. But in most of the manual models, that post was too short to truly stabilize the attachment. Any time we added food to the bowl, the blade attachment was knocked out of position, forcing us to reach into the food and recenter the blade attachment in order for it to engage with the turning mechanism—an unnerving, dangerous maneuver. Handwashing the blades also proved to be a risky business; the blades on one model bit through a sponge and into a user's fingers, drawing blood. The blades are also small and almost always spaced in such a way that they are difficult to safely clean. You will not only get cleaner, more consistently shaped pieces than with a manual food processor but also have fewer parts to wash, and your fingers will be in less danger. It minces and chops beautifully; produces perfectly smooth dips, marinades, and dressings; and even makes mayonnaise—all in less time and with less effort than it would take with one of the manual gadgets. It's very small and somewhat finicky to use, and it can't chop or dice well. But it minced onions and parsley uniformly and with slightly less bruising than the other models we tested and made good pesto in the shortest amount of time. It's the only way I'll cook a whole chicken again. Simple, easy, quick, no mess perfect every time. I've used both stainless steel and cast iron pans.

I will say there were no pan juices, just fat in the skillet. Will add to the recipe rotation. Good for family and company dinners too. Ive done this using a rimmed sheet pan instead of a skillet and put veggies and potatoes around the chicken for a one pan meal. Broccoli gets nicely browned and yummy! I will say there were no pan juices, just fat in the skillet. Will add to the recipe rotation. Good for family and company dinners too. Would not have thought that the amount of time under the broiler would have produced a very juicy and favorable chicken with a very crispy crust. This is a great recipe, and I will definitely make it again. My butcher gladly butterflied the chicken for me, therefore I found it to be a fast and easy prep. I used my cast iron skillet marvellous! So much better than your typical oven baked chicken and on par if not better than gas or even charcoal grilled. It gets that smokey charcoal tasted and overnight koshering definitely helps, something I do when time permits. Firsttime Ive pierced a whole chicken minus the times I make jerk chicken on the grill. Yup, the cast iron was not an issue. Your email address is required to identify you for free access to content on the site.
